

Church Family News and Prayers

The step we don't want to take

Rhiannon, our daughter, is now in her 30s but I remember vividly when she was a teenager and the different opinions on holiday destinations. Rhiannon wanted to see the world; Alison wanted to see Scotland. Rhiannon fancied Barbados; Alison fancied Betws-y-Coed. In those circumstances, I should have been the family mediator.

In reality, I wasn't much use. It came to a head one year when Rhiannon got invited to go with a friend and had a fabulous fortnight in Thailand. Not only did we miss her, Alison realised that the success of future family holidays would depend on her getting back on a plane. Not something she was a fan of.

"And you're no help," she told me, "because you don't make me do it." Now I've got into trouble for many things over the years but that was the first time for failing to be a bully! I felt a bit miffed to be honest.

Having said that, when I thought about it a bit harder, I realised that a relationship is not always about pleasing someone, it can also be about challenging them. Now I know there are times when we may ask the impossible of each other and some people are much more fearful flyers than Alison. However, that's no reason to always avoid the difficult things.

I wouldn't have ever found my faith if someone hadn't challenged me to stop playing with words and decide whether or not it was worth taking that step of trusting God – the one that looks like a step in the darkness and turns out to be a step into light. And I'm not sure I'd have ever asked Alison to marry me, if a close friend hadn't told me that sometimes you have to risk a "no" if you ever want to hear a "yes".

It's always easier to say nice things or nothing but sometimes it's our job to gently push each other into the next stage of our lives.
